Unpacking the Dynamics of Domestic Contestation

The concept of domestic contestation refers to the ways in which national actors, such as parliaments, political parties, and interest groups, engage with and influence EU decision-making processes. This engagement can take various forms, ranging from outright opposition to constructive dialogue.

The Journal of European Public Policy delves into the multifaceted dimensions of domestic contestation. It explores how domestic actors shape EU policy outputs, examining their roles in agenda-setting, negotiation, and implementation. The journal also investigates the impact of EU policies on domestic political systems, analyzing how they influence national institutions, party dynamics, and public opinion.

A Kaleidoscope of Perspectives

The journal showcases a diverse range of theoretical and methodological approaches, reflecting the complexity of domestic contestation. Scholars employ comparative case studies, quantitative analysis, and qualitative interviews to uncover the intricate interplay between national and European politics.

By presenting multiple perspectives, the Journal of European Public Policy fosters a rich dialogue among researchers, policymakers, and practitioners. It stimulates critical thinking, challenges conventional wisdom, and advances our understanding of the dynamic relationship between domestic politics and EU integration.
